The City Nanjing is a thriving city of over 8 million people, the capital city of Jiangsu Province in east China.

Situated in the Lower Yangtze River Valley and part of the Yangtze River Delta economic zone, one of the largest economic zones in China, Nanjing is the second largest commercial centre in that zone, after Shanghai. It is a hub for research, transportation and tourism and, like many major cities in China, the economy also focuses on electronics, automobile, petrochemical, iron and steel production.

One of China’s four ancient capitals, Nanjing is one of the few Chinese cities to have truly preserved its cultural heritage. The towering pagodas, well-preserved Ming Dynasty gardens and Confucian temples blend seamlessly with the modern city which continues to develop around them.

Nanjing is home to many good universities and the highly-regarded Nanjing University was placed in the top five in the Times Higher Education's top five universities in China (2018). Nanjing is second only to Beijing in terms of the percentage of postgraduates living in the city. Perhaps unsurprisingly, it is considered a highly attractive destination for multinational corporations.

Nanjing lies within China’s subtropical monsoon climate zone and the weather is mostly subtropical and humid; however, the city does enjoy four distinct seasons: experiencing both extensive sunshine and welcome rainfall. With an average temperature in the summer months of 30°, spring and autumn are the most comfortable seasons, and this is when most people can be found outdoors, enjoying parks, lakes and hiking paths. Successful urban greening programmes have created an ecologically-friendly environment and have developed Nanjing into a comfortable, attractive modern city.

Located at the junction of "The Belt and Road Initiative", Nanjing has a highly-developed infrastructure of transport links. Although roads can be busy, the extensive highway network and convenient public transport options make travel easy. China's high-speed rail network connects Nanjing to most major cities within a few hours (Shanghai in just over an hour and Beijing in just over three). Nanjing Lukou International Airport offers routes to major destinations in China, Asia and around the world.

Although Nanjing is developing quickly, the pace of life remains slower and the people are generally more relaxed than in China’s first-tier cities. A truly international community, with a thriving expatriate population of around 20,000 people, Nanjing has the leading brands and creature comforts that you would expect of a large, international city. There are a variety of western and Asian restaurants and bars available across the city and, for day-to-day living, a range of western supermarkets to complement Chinese options. Local hospitals have some English-speaking staff.

The school campus is located in the scenically beautiful Tangshan Hot Spring Resort area, but with excellent access to central Nanjing, Nanjing International Airport and Nanjing high-speed railway station.
